Keynote Address: Children in Mission

Christian missions have been decidedly ambivalent about the value of children. While Christians have earned a reputation of protecting the lives of vulnerable children over the past two millennia, some have argued that this has been more commonly motivated by the desire to preserve the image of innocence that children represent than a real appreciation of children for who they are and what they contribute. But in recent years changes have been taking place. Churches, denominations, and mission agencies have been reevaluating the importance of children in their formal and informal mission strategies. Concern for vulnerable children is increasingly being perceived as a legitimate missional enterprise, and the role that children can play as evangelists in their families and communities is suddenly a worthwhile topic for serious missiological reflection. In this session we will consider some of these developments, along with the biblical texts that are informing them, in order to adjust our perception of children, and in turn reconsider our own roles as children partnering with our heavenly Father in his Mission.
